The Hidden Risks of Helping Clients with Legal Services  By Ron Klein, J.D., CFE

If you search the Internet for “legal forms,” several website links will appear, offering free downloads and software to anyone who wants to incorporate a business, lease real estate, make a will, draft a loan agreement, issue a promissory note, amend a contract, and many other activities.

Given the climate of seemingly free legal offerings, clients will sometimes ask their CPA to assist them with the preparation of forms and documents as they seek to form or liquidate corporations, partnerships, estates, trusts, or any entity that requires organizational documents. At other times clients will ask for help with documents that pertain to mergers, acquisitions, dissolutions, employment, severance, compensation, or stock option plans.

Professionals in the fields of law and accounting have long debated how much assistance a CPA should provide a client in this area. The pertinent laws differ by state and are constantly changing. For example, a recent court opinion found that CPAs may advise clients as to the appropriate contents of routine, prepared, fill-in-the-blank certificates readily available to the public, provided CPAs inform their clients that assistance of counsel in the drafting of such documents is advisable. (CPAs should also inform clients in writing for documentation purposes.)

Many legal professionals advocate that CPAs and attorneys work together as a team in any complex business situation. That is, attorneys require their clients to have a CPA, and CPAs require their clients to have an attorney.

Effective Legal Defense

By helping clients with legal forms and documents, CPAs can inadvertently expand their liability exposures when they should be trying to limit exposures. Further, an effective legal defense can sometimes be hampered by the CPA helping the client with activity outside the typical CPA functions.

Oftentimes, a plaintiff’s objective is to connect the CPA to a failed transaction, when in fact the CPA may have been only peripherally involved. The CPA will want to demonstrate and prove the limits of his or her involvement in those transactions. In the event of a claim the CPA can then be distanced from the damages. But when the CPA was involved in even simple legal matters, the task of proving the CPA’s limited involvement in the transaction, and whatever damages may have stemmed from it, becomes more challenging.

On top of that concern is the issue of not being qualified or trained to spot potential legal problems. Examples include:
- corporate documents that are inadequate in preventing alter-ego claims whereby claimants attempt to pierce the corporate “veil” and hold shareholders responsible for debts and damages; and
- promissory notes that are inadequate and inappropriate when they may be considered subject to securities laws.

CPAs who get involved in what are commonly thought to be legal services might open the door for a plaintiff to allege – likely unfairly – a separate ground for a malpractice claim in some situations, and regulatory consequences may follow.

When working with the impact of laws and regulations, especially those related to taxation, CPAs need to recognize that there are limits to what they can do without crossing the line and inadvertently “practicing law.” Treasury Circular 230 allows CPAs to represent tax clients’ interests before the Internal Revenue Service, which means CPAs may need to: 1) analyze and interpret how tax laws apply to particular client fact patterns; and 2) consult with tax clients regarding the resulting analyses and interpretations.

Many states have adopted Circular 230 as part of their own state regulations. CPAs should consult an attorney, however, when a tax issue involves legal principles that extend beyond tax law, or when any other type of issue or engagement involves legal principles that need to be interpreted for clients.

Guidelines

CPAs may need to stop and consult an attorney when working in the following areas:

- Legal principles extending beyond assisting and advising the client about tax laws; e.g., partnership issues when the CPA is analyzing obligations created by the partnership agreement, agreements with creditors, and any side agreements among the parties.
- Issues requiring interpretations of state or local law extending beyond tax law; e.g., partnerships, real estate, estates and gifts, and business valuation issues, especially when family limited partnerships (FLPs) or family limited liability companies (FLLCs) are used. Also, issues presenting a mix of legal, tax and accounting questions; e.g., entity choices and classifications, as in LLCs and LLPs, and estate and gift taxation. When tax issues become intertwined with legal rights (classic examples include wills and trusts), or when there are unusual or irregular proposed interpretations, or competing interests, the CPA should consider asking the client’s attorney for an opinion.
- Formation or liquidation of legal entities; e.g., corporations, partnerships, estates and/or trusts, or any entity that requires the drafting of organizational documents.
- Agreements and documents for mergers, acquisitions, dissolutions, liquidations, employment, compensation, stock option plans, or severance.
- Any consulting services involving a legal component; e.g., compensation and benefits planning, and personal financial planning (PFP) when the formation of trusts or other estate planning/asset protection techniques is involved.

Most states in the U.S. have statutes or regulations covering these areas, and some states have interpretations that are stricter than others. Always check the laws of the state in question.

Clients will sometimes pressure the CPA firm to provide legal services in order to avoid a fee from a law firm, but CPAs who yield to such pressure may ultimately find themselves named in a complaint as the first step toward a lawsuit. The fee received by the CPA for some services is just not worth the exposure to potential litigation.

Neither party may truly understand how their duties differ. This course provides a solid understanding of systems and control documentation. After an overview of the latest COSO guidance on the components and principles of effective internal control, this course introduces participants to basic tools used to document an accounting process. Participants then identify the risks of errors and fraud in the accounting system and the presence (or absence) of compensating controls. Finally, participants will practice identifying key controls and control weaknesses.

A list of the Top Ten Fraud Schemes, based upon these studies, is provided. Fraud red flags for non-traditional schemes are addressed. The categories of non-traditional fraud schemes include corruption, Ponzi, and Asset Flip schemes. These non-traditional fraud schemes are not usually addressed in traditional accounting fraud courses. These schemes methodologies, related red flags and internal controls to prevent and detect these schemes are addressed in detail. Real-world cases are provided to reinforce concepts.

COURSE OBJECTIVES AND DESCRIPTION: Revenue and cash receipts are two critical areas that require strong controls to prevent intentional fraud or unintentional misstatements. While there is well-publicized fraud in these areas in larger companies, it also occurs in smaller businesses and nonprofit entities. A sound system of internal controls is needed to help prevent fraud occurrence. All too often, a “one-size-fits-all” system is put in place without considering the uniqueness of each entity. It is crucial that an internal control system is tailored so that the areas of greatest risk receive the most attention.

While most other programs primarily use lecture, this program relies totally on solving problems through case studies. Some of the financial problems tackled will include financial and operating leverage, increasing department efficiency, planning and the proper use of metrics. During the program, finance professionals will have an opportunity to face real and simulated problems and then work in small groups to come up with the best solutions. These will be practical problems that are found in an organizational setting every day, and the participants will have the opportunity to hear several different approaches to solutions. Objectives: See different approaches to financial leverage; develop a planning system that works for your company; see new ways to increase financial department efficiency.

While most other programs use some case studies along with lecture, this course uses only case studies to discuss various important skills for the finance professional. The program presents real-life and simulated problems exploring the various ways for effective solution. Some of the important cases will discuss things like surviving corporate politics, being a change-maker within the organization, conflict management, and how to increase morale among employees. The program will bring finance professionals up to speed and prepare them to solve similar problems to those they encounter on the job every day. The difference is that during this class they will have the opportunity to hear several opinions on the best way to solve the problem.

COURSE OBJECTIVES AND DESCRIPTION: The primary duty of a CPA is to protect the assets of their organization. This requires an increasing understanding of the key functions of the business, the overall environment, and analytical techniques. When a firm fails, it is usually due to several identified problems. However, these problems often result from a small number of poor practices that infect the entire organization. They can include such items as reliance on inappropriate or inaccurate data/measurements, lack of understanding of long-term costs, the absence of a functioning asset allocation process and/or plan, inaction, an inability to identify and thus manage risk, etc. In numerous instances an organization will repeat a bad practice across the enterprise. Too often, such activities are not detected until significant damage has been done. This course identifies practices, techniques and analytical tools, and relates them specifically to key tasks/functions of CPAs and other financial professionals. These activities include: general analysis, decision making, cost management, selected accounting practices, budgeting, forecasting, measuring and reporting. In addition, the course provides insights on managing through a business cycle and redefines some ideas about risk management.

Tech Bit 92: BYOD

When I was in college, back in the middle ages, party invitations frequently came with the notation BYOB, “bring your own booze.”

Now, more and more job offers come with the notation BYOD, “bring your own device.”

Another FLA (four letter acronym) being used to describe this change is CoIT, or the Consumerism of IT. One variant I like is Cooperative IT.

This was one of the recurring themes at this last year’s Defrag conference.

Oddly, this isn’t a new phenomenon. Back in the late 1970’s, when the Apple II was just becoming popular, people would sneak on into work to run the spreadsheet software Visicalc, often putting the relatively low cost computers on expense reports (although even in the days of 3 martini lunches how you could put $2,000 of computer on an expense report baffles me).

Then IT figured out having all these rogue computers in the office, often hooked up to the mainframe system with odd connections, were a support and security nightmare, so they clamped down. Only company issued devices can be used for work!

I’ve actually met people traveling who have two laptop computers, two cell phones, pretty much two of everything you might travel with, all in an oversized wheeled computer bag.

Generally, most employees’ personal devices are more state of the art than the company issued ones. Interested employees often are reading about what is the latest and greatest and can decide to buy that device when it is released. IT is usually constrained to a list of approved vendors, who are considered safe, and must do a formal evaluation before making a purchase decision. Sadly, that sometimes means the technology is obsolete before it is even deployed to the employees.

And often the employees know how to use their own devices better than the company issued ones. It’s their computer or phone after all. So their productivity is lower with the company issued phone or computer.

But IT was/is in total control, so security and support is lower right? Not always.

The good news is more companies are realizing that employees are capable of making good technology decisions, they are doing it for themselves all the time. So more and more of the time, instead of forbidding “foreign” phones or computers, companies are allowing them, sometimes even encouraging them.

The role of IT becomes less of the prophets on high bringing the Windows XP tablets down from the mountain right after the iPad gets introduced, and more the Geek Squad for the company, offering pre-purchase advice and on-going support. In fact Geek Squad got its start offering tech support back up to business IT groups (at Defrag Robert Stephens mentioned his best marketing tool in the early days were Carnival Cruise brochures with a card that read “When was the last time you took a vacation” sent to server administrators). Geek Squad still does corporate IT support, a fact often overlooked by their Best Buy connection.

But the CoIT revolution isn’t stopping at hardware, more and more employees are bringing new software options to work. These options are often web applications that can replace more expensive traditional corporate software. Google Docs ends up replacing Microsoft Office, offering enough of the functionality to satisfy the user at a fraction of the cost, and adding a collaboration bonus that is harder to implement in a traditional IT environment. There are a huge number of web applications, many of them with freemium business models that let you get started and prove the benefits before incurring any costs. Your employees will find them for you.

Another great example of how consumer IT has impacted business is YouTube. Most people think of YouTube as the place to go to watch dogs talk or cute baby videos. But many people are finding YouTube is a great “how to” resource. One manufacturer I used to represent, Moon Faucet, has a whole series of how to fix your faucet videos that reduce the number of warranty claims.

Hosting video on your own web server is expensive. Video files are large and web server storage is often limited. And if many people view your video you may exceed your bandwidth on your server, incurring additional charges.

But you can upload that video to YouTube where you don’t have to pay for storage or bandwidth. An added benefit of video on YouTube is people may find your video that wouldn’t find it normally. YouTube is the #2 most used search engine behind its parent company Google.

Creating a YouTube video can be done with simple equipment. I wrote an article many years ago that suggested you could create videos with only a $1-2,000 investment in equipment. Now many smart phones can take HD video and upload it directly to YouTube, making the cost of producing and distributing video virtually nothing.

The Apple II with Visicalc may have started the current trend to CoIT. It is definitely catching on. Embrace the new uses your employees will come up with on their own. Allow them to use their own devices (computer or smart phone) while working for you. Even support them with a staff member or a Geek Squad contract. If you really want to adopt BYOD, you might even consider giving employees an allowance to spend on those devices. It will pay off in the long run.
